Human trophoblast cell fusion: a powerful tool for the analysis of fusion-related gene expression. The concept of fusion between cytotrophoblasts and syncytiotrophoblasts as a key mechanism in the formation of human placenta has been established recently. In this study, a model to explore the mechanism of fusion-related gene regulation in human trophoblast cells is described. For this purpose, the human trophoblast cell line SGHPL-4 was transfected with a plasmid containing an SV40 enhancer/promoter linked to the green fluorescent protein (GFP) gene to permit the monitoring of cell fusion by analysis of GFP expression. Evidence of trophoblast cell fusion was obtained by the detection of GFP-positive cells. In addition, the expression of tumor necrosis factor-alpha was studied by reverse transcriptase-polymerase chain reaction. The expression of the tumor necrosis factor-alpha gene was found to be upregulated when the trophoblast cell line was exposed to fusion-inducing agents such as tumor necrosis factor-alpha and phorbol 12-myristate 13-acetate. To validate the model for studying gene expression during human trophoblast fusion, gene expressions that were previously shown to be involved in trophoblast cell fusion were studied by quantitative reverse transcriptase-polymerase chain reaction. Upregulated expression of the invasion-associated genes, urokinase-type plasminogen activator, leukocyte common antigen, and intercellular adhesion molecule-1 was observed. In addition, the fusion-related genes, glucose transporter-1 and -3, the integrin alpha6beta4, and the adapter protein EAT-2 were also found to be upregulated. The results presented in this study demonstrate that fusion-related genes are upregulated during trophoblast cell fusion. The role of pre-treatment measurements in target delineation for external beam radiotherapy of prostate cancer. An MRI based image fusion method was applied for pre-treatment target delineation in prostate cancer patients. The aim of this study is the evaluation of
