What's new in Acquiescence:

5/9/2017 Update: Six months ago I last updated this review of the A-Tech Cybernetic VR. The company has had their headsets on clearance at several retailers for the past month, now it seems that they will be moving back to their usual EVP store pricing (below) when they inevitably move them back on to the web. It seems like a good time to revisit this article and re-evaluate A-Tech Cybernetic's entry into this category. Founded in 2008, A-Tech has an interesting history. They make a variety of oral hygiene products, washing machines and graphics cards, but in the end, they're a company that just makes VR headsets. They've got a bigger focus on innovation and quality than you're likely to see on the market, having released the V-Sense real-time 3D sensor for gaming, in 2015. I haven't used this product myself, as I've stuck to the Valve Index and Altspace demos, but it seems to be an intriguing and different approach. One of the things I really appreciate about A-Tech is how much they seem to genuinely want to improve their handsets for customers. It's not just that the Prime is great, but the process of guiding customers through the trial process, keeping in contact with them from product release to resolution of issues, is so much more appreciated than you get from most other manufacturers. They're very active on their Facebook and Instagram, replying to comments and reaching out to users more than you'd expect from a company that's just making headsets, and they use this positive touch to build their brand and reposition their brand as one that actually cares about their customers. One of the many great aspects of their product releases is how they do it. Historically, most headsets were released without even a web page for them, so you'd spend days, weeks or months trying to work out the route to information about the headset. This is a company that promotes open access to their materials and their release notes through GitHub and a newsletter that often out-cheek's most specialist manufacturers. This all ends up in making it easier for people to buy a headset, and completely destroying the exclusivity offered by companies like Oculus and Samsung (a situation from which they've now recovered). My only real concern is how will they perform over long-term use. While the product seems well made, at time of writing I still have a headset that's been through a couple of rough programs in the
