The focus of this project is stroke, a major cause of mortality and disability. The investigators plan to address three immediate objectives: 1) to develop reagents and techniques that will allow for genetic analysis of the recombination process in P. falciparum, 2) to establish approaches to the development of new chemotherapeutic agents targeting the intraerythrocytic forms of P. falciparum, and 3) to develop a system that will be used to determine the possible role of secreted proteins in the immune response of human hosts. The development of genetically marked P. falciparum lines is an essential prerequisite for this work. The reagents and techniques that will be developed in the course of the project include an expression vector that will allow for the expression of foreign genes in P. falciparum, a recombination vector that will allow for the reinsertion of sequences from an existing gene, the development of a method for the detection of recombination in the transfected P. falciparum line, and the construction of a test line that will be able to be genetically selected. The techniques will be used to investigate the nature of the antigen associated with the major

Effects of neonicotinoid insecticides on the desert locust Schistocerca gregaria. The effects of eight neonicotinoid insecticides on the desert locust Schistocerca gregaria are described in this paper. Administration of imidacloprid, acetamiprid and thiamethoxam (0.001 to 10 microg) per locust every 24 h for 6 days caused dose-related and time-dependent changes in walking, muscle tone, locomotor frequency and coordination. The lowest doses of imidacloprid (0.01 to 0.1 microg/locust) and acetamiprid (0.01 to 0.1 microg/locust) significantly increased the walking speed (90 to 400% increase) and tended to decrease muscle tone (90-20% decrease), whereas the lowest dose (0.1 microg/locust) of thiamethoxam significantly increased muscle tone. The higher doses of all three insecticides decreased muscle tone significantly (80-40% decrease). All three insecticides significantly decreased the locomotor frequency (60-100% decrease) and coordination (60-90% decrease) of locusts that were kept walking on a treadmill. The locusts treated with the higher doses of imidacloprid showed significantly smaller distance travelled and shorter duration per passage than the controls. Although the treated locusts showed better survival at 6 days than the control locusts, the differences did not reach significance. The results suggest that thiamethoxam and imidacloprid might have long-term toxicity to S. gregaria. Shahaniya Sh
