use and the advantages of the American system, and encourages him to leave his home and country. These acts and declarations are given as bearing on the political character of the American states, and the method by which alone their laws can be rendered effectual. In reply, it is said by the gentleman, that as these acts are in pursuance of the federal government, and operate on individuals, it is the duty of the state to examine into them, and decide what is the law of the state. The gentleman goes on to say, that the state may be convicted of a federal crime; but this argument has already been answered by the gentleman who made it. He states the object of the bill is to decide, by the states, in their respective courts, what is the law of the United States, and insists that it may be decided in conformity to that law in all the courts of the state. If the state is not so anxious to attend to this matter, she may adopt the present American system of carrying it into effect by her own laws. The gentleman, however, refutes this view by the following sentence, which is adopted from the bill: "it is of the very first importance to society, and the state can adopt no system under which such a universal and constant violation of that duty and interest can be perpetuated." "It is the first duty of the United States to protect the citizen, and this principle cannot be disputed. That law is founded, not on the volition of the citizen, but on his utility. With him the very elements of human government rest on the immutable basis of a duty, a pleasure, and a consequent interest. This is the true ground on which
