The aim of this study was to develop a new and more convenient method to screen for disease-modifying anti-rheumatic drugs (DMARDs) in animal models of rheumatoid arthritis (RA). First, genetically modified luciferase-expressing C57BL/6 mice (Luc2) were generated. We were then able to show that in Luc2 mice, immunization with the collagen II (CII) peptide resulted in a more severe and severe inflammatory response than immunization with native CII. When intraperitoneally administered luciferin was added to Luc2 mice, homogenous distribution and high intensity were observed in all organs. Subsequently, we administered complete Freund's adjuvant (CFA) into Luc2 mice, then added luciferin by intraperitoneal injection. The resulting bioluminescence was stronger than that seen in Luc2 mice immunized with native CII peptides. The signal lasted for several weeks after luciferin administration. An arthritic score, based on swelling, redness, pain, and deformity, was significantly higher in Luc2 mice immunized with CII-bovine serum albumin (BSA) than in those immunized with native CII. Adjuvant-induced arthritis (AIA) in Luc2 mice was also significantly more severe than in mice immunized with native CII. A total of 96 DMARD candidates were tested for their ability to ameliorate arthritis in Luc2 mice immunized with CII-BSA. One candidate, indomethacin, significantly reduced the severity of arthritis. Next, we used this system to screen DMARDs in mice that spontaneously develop arthritis. We found that DMARD candidates could also ameliorate arthritis in this model. Our results showed that luciferase-expressing mice can be used for preclinical screening of DMARDs in inflammatory arthritis in mice.Igor Golubev Igor Viktorovich Golubev (; born 14 May 1992 in Moscow) is a Russian bobsledder.
