The short answer is that we find them and report them to the relevant developers. If enough bugs are reported, the developer will take action and fix them. In a game like RimWorld this is pretty hard. There's no

"kill" button. Instead, you need to manage a population in a colony that is fighting against diseases, starvation, wolves, and various other reasons for a colony to go extinct. The real hard work is in surveying the colony to track various health measures. This isn't something I've had to do often (and then I'm playing a very good colony!). In the real world, I'd be looking at bar charts and trying to interpret them to get a picture of how well a colony is faring. In RimWorld, I can't actually see the relevant graphs. So, my job is to inspect and record. I spend a good portion of the time in the "in-game log" watching the colony and making notes. The information I gather is kept for a while, with a backup copy being kept automatically. So, if a bug needs to
