Master Set Click on the image above to purchase from Amazon Friday, October 2, 2010 Halt n' Catch the Zeek Spot When I was a kid, I played ATARI games like Pitfall on the 5200, plenty of late night hours and weekends spent perched on my kitchen counter playing Joust or Asteroids. About 32 years later, an LCD game like Nintendo's Pitfall resembles Ico. In fact, it even borrows the controls from Joust. Imagine the surprise to discover a game was created like Pitfall, except aimed at Nintendo gamers, and the version included was as easy as the NES version. Now, based on the reviews I'm reading, which I've typically not done, it looks as though the game might have a difficult learning curve, but hey - I can just quit if I need to see a doctor! Failing to mention that the game has difficulty level adjustments, the only clue a novice might get is that the Pitfall function is accessed by pressing a single button that looks like a baseball bat. The spot is indicated as a long horizontal line on the bottom of the screen, and it can be moved up and down the screen in the Pitfall zone. In one game, the top of the line -- representing the Pitfall zone -- is over a short bridge that has no pits, but if you fall off, you start over from the beginning and get one errant trigger. In some games, the level changes, and the levels have different levels of difficulty. Given the simplicity of the controls, you don't need to worry about enemies too much. Rather, you'll probably be concentrating on getting the mouse's control over vertical placement over Pitfall without letting the mouse drift out of control. Also, be careful of any switches. Getting caught near a switch with a shaded trigger area on it will cause a jolt of energy, and you'll have to start from square one. And, while you can go look for locations, there are only so many before you have to start from square one again. Also, be very careful of environmental hazards that can bring down tall players into the maelstroms below, and try to stay under the Pitfall line to make it through without going in. While it appears relatively risk-free, even for the novice, keep in mind that wherever you are, you'll have a beeline back if you do get the mouse control out of control.
