toÂ .Q: Is the word "realisation" ambiguous in "multidisciplinary realisations"? I was just writing an abstract for an article and at some point I wrote: "findings across disciplines will generate new insights and realisations regarding these facts". Unfortunately for the author of the article I am writing for, I happened to have said "realisations" when I meant "realisations". As a result, the author still edits my work while introducing the topic and I just couldn't continue with my main content. The problem is that I will try to persuade them to accept my version and use it in their work. However, I was curious to know if this word is ambiguous or not. I understand how it looks and it seems fine. However, I am not sure if it is proper. I found here in the dictionary "realisation" in plural form, that is the "realisations" in my sentence. I also found that in the Free Dictionary, there is an article about "realisations". Realisation, n. The immediate realization of anything which is so immediate that it leaves no time for reflection. -- Oxford Dictionary. Realisation: the action of realising or the state of being realised: So, in the end, I think my only recourse is to improve
