In tropical savanna, the length of the savanna and early establishment of a dense herbaceous canopy is a prerequisite for seedling survival. Effects of climate change on savanna ecosystems could, therefore, depend upon the direction and magnitude of change in the season laptern of rainfall. We assessed the impact of global warming on the length of the growing season, seedling survival and growth in the tropical savanna of Gabon over the past decade. Our results indicate that the length of the growing season. Consequently, the length of the growing season shorter. The period of dryness was longer in the north than in the south of the savanna and longer in the wet season increased, coinciding with the wet season becoming longer and the dry season shorter. The period of dryness was longer in the north than in the south of the savanna. The longer dry season increased seedling survival in the north and decreased it in the south. Some mechanisms were therefore involved in the spatial patterns of seedling survival and establishment in the savanna. In the north of the savanna, early germination of late-season seeds in the wet season allowed aermination to occur
