The U.S. Department of Justice today announced the first use of a GPS device to track whether motorists were obeying the speed limit when traveling within the state. The state has installed speed and red light cameras to improve traffic safety. These camera systems, together with new laws, will increase traffic safety and will raise tens of millions of dollars to help the state government manage the impact on law enforcement and the county's treasured public infrastructure. A coalition of 18 states and the District of Columbia began deploying this technology across the United States in 2010 to demonstrate the feasibility of using GPS to improve traffic safety. The Department of Transportation has begun replacing traffic signals with cameras around the nation. "For years, law enforcement agencies have pushed for a system that makes it possible for law enforcement to keep their eyes on motorists violating state and local traffic laws," said U.S. Attorney for the District of Colorado John Walsh. "The system we use today is taking us one step closer to that ultimate goal." "Thousands of motorists are caught by traffic cameras every day with no system in place to provide accurate records of those infractions," said Colorado Chief of State's Attorneys in Denver County Patrick Blair. "For the first time, we have a method to track whether the driver was breaking the law." The Justice Department is working with the National Association of Attorneys General to educate law enforcement agencies and is collaborating with state and local agencies to deploy the system. "In the past, state and local law enforcement agencies that wanted to use traffic cameras had a need to know if drivers were violating the law," said Craig Stevens, Assistant Attorney General for the Department of Justice's Criminal Division. "We are excited that the first county to adopt the technology has started to turn this vision into a reality." Recording device

The technology is the result of a multi-year partnership among the U.S. Department of Justice, the District of Colorado and Denver County State Attorney's Office. The system uses in-vehicle mobile data recorders to
