Added fog effect here and there, as I heard that the placeholder night sky in the demo video was too bright. I haven't been able to find a good resource to look at yet, so hopefully this doesn't look too bad. There's a couple of sprites missing, which aren't particularly important, as the game will be playable without them. However, I've added graphics for Akira and Miki. I drew them, but I'm not sure what kind of texture should be used for them. I've noticed that with some games, they have more weight if there are things falling from the clouds, which is what I was going for, but I'm not sure what was used for the light source for the clouds. Also, I'm not sure if I'm using the correct textures. For some reason, the moon textures are really dark (see near the top of the sprite sheet). This sounds promising, I'm glad I checked it out. I think I'm going to try and emulate some of the Japanese features and add a couple of basic effects like rain, flowers, fireflies, etc. After that, I'll improve on the game's sprite graphics. I'm probably going to try and get to it sooner than later.

TRIP TO EXPLORATION - Games can be a lot of fun, especially when you spend them with your friends. With little effort on your behalf you can just drive anywhere you want. But what do you do if the area around your house is just not interesting enough? That's where the advent of a new kind of map comes in, one which offers a more varied terrain. The team at SEI, the leading creator of MMO games, were eager to test out new areas, too, and decided to do so on a high quality scale. They used regular maps in combination with a first class vector graphics mapping technology for producing a variety of great landscapes for their players to explore. By providing new locations with each release, game developers can always offer their players new adventures in the first-person and offer them an increasing variety of locations to explore. With the latest map packs "Green Valley", "Red Desert" and "Desert" you can enjoy even more fun in your everyday gaming sessions. "Red Desert" in particular has a variety of locations which will let you enjoy a varied gaming experience in the middle of beautiful deserts. When choosing the map "Red Desert", you can decide for yourself whether you want to find the highest mountain or go exploring in the local ruins. While you drive around, you will encounter a variety of different creatures which may or may not be friendly. This is a good thing, because they are all really enjoyable to watch. VARIETY OF LOCATIONS - Our customers have lots of different interests. If you're into one thing, you will not find yourself bored in the next map. You can go to the 'hiking peak', climb the mountain or explore the desert on foot. Meanwhile, if you like watching birds, you will find plenty of them in the "Green Valley". If you love animals, you'll love the "Desert", where you will find camels and tigers, as well as a variety of other interesting creatures. Whether it's "Red Desert", "Green Valley" or the "Desert", the things in these maps are interesting to watch. UNSTOPPABLE IMMERSION - The images show the result of the terrain generation of the latest map pack. The game allows you to travel through the huge expanses of the plains and cities, with a variety of interesting locations. You can drive around in every area and take in the view, but never get bored. The variety of the areas also means of the Terror The night before the Tour de France started Julien Boisverot prepared for the race. He went out jogging with friends and watched the demonstrations with his father. "In the morning," Julien says, "we are raring to go. We see the presentation, we go to the team hotel, and we expect to feel good to go." Then again, he says, "But if, when we see how the roads are, we start feeling bad, no one can make us go faster." On the road to the start in Dijon, the first 3,000-mile day of the Tour, Julien was grim. He wasn't disappointed that he had the physical appearance of a bike racer. He was disappointed by how hot it was. He was sorry that the stars of the Tour weren't in the race. But it was only the beginning. On the road to Le Croisic, in Brittany, Julien was drowsy. He still had as much fight left in him as the first stage. It would be another 500 miles to Marseilles, and a 1,000-mile day, and he knew he could hit 10,000 kilometers without breaking a sweat. But there was no more response in his legs, no more reaction to the road, no more energy. He rode in silence. The bike handlebars would rise and fall; he'd be rolling; then there'd be no more hand on the bike, no aim or drive. Only his arms moving to clear the air out of his mouth. And then, Julien knew, the stage was over for him. Because he'd forgotten how to ride a bike. On the last stage to the Tour's end in Lyon, Julien pulled completely out of the race. It would have been better to have finished among the winners than to have struggled up to the finish on a bike that wasn't his bike. Sometimes Julien doesn't know anything about the Tour, and sometimes he knows too much. People come to ask him how it is the Tour is nothing for him, then they watch him walk quickly, ignoring the race he hasn't long left in. "People start asking about the Tour," he says, "and then I remember, that no one has ever asked me how the Tour is nothing for me." Because for him the Tour is everything, or nearly everything. "C'est la Tour," he says. "Everything
