Description of the Related Art In the manufacture of semiconductor devices, layers of various material are typically deposited or grown on a semiconductor substrate. One of the purposes of the deposition is to create a surface on which various additional layers may be deposited. For example, a layer of silicon nitride can be deposited on a semiconductor substrate by a low pressure chemical vapor deposition (LPCVD) technique. Other techniques may be used, for example, physical vapor deposition (PVD) or atomic layer deposition (ALD). As the demand for semiconductor devices increases, the need for a continuous and more efficient LPCVD technique also increases. Thus, in addition to reducing the cost associated with fabricating semiconductor devices, there is a need for a continuous and more efficient LPCVD technique.
