A robust data-driven public health surveillance system is needed for acute and chronic disease prevention and control. Unfortunately, in recent years the public health surveillance community has been faced with increasing levels of budget cuts, loss of staff, and pressure to produce more data within a given time frame. This situation is exacerbated by the lack of data-driven solutions that can be easily and quickly applied to meet the most immediate public health needs in a reliable and efficient manner. Confronted with this challenge, public health surveillance societies in the USA, UK, and elsewhere have developed web-based services that facilitate data sharing, centralization of data, and dissemination of results. These approaches are not new; however, they have been implemented in an inefficient and uncoordinated manner. This lack of coordination and integration of the surveillance systems, however, hinders the ability of the surveillance community to keep pace with the rapid pace of scientific advancements and changing health care guidelines. In this special issue, we introduce a new method and paradigm for improved public health surveillance systems. Utilizing a public health surveillance information and workflow management (SWIFT) framework to capture and organize data over multiple surveillance systems that have a shared data model, data-driven recommendations for public health actions, and documentation of 6d1f23a050
