The majority of postgraduate neuroscience PhDs spend a significant portion of their time researching how to make brain-computer interfaces (BCIs) more reliable. But for some, the primary incentive is making the technologies that make BCIs possible. Ongoing research from the labs of Arthur Toga at the Picower Institute for Learning and Memory (PILM) at MIT, and Nancy Samuels at Washington University in St. Louis is helping develop implanted electronics that can help support or even restore brain function. In a recent New Phytologist paper, the research team describes their work on a type of bacterial biofilm that can be used to safely colonize and protect electrodes that have been placed in the brain for recording and stimulating brain activity. The research is addressing an important side effect of brain implant technology that has drawn renewed attention. The electrodes not only track and measure electrical activity, but they also send out stimulating electric pulses that can be used to interfere with the thought processes of individuals suffering from neurological disorders such as epilepsy or Parkinson's disease. The bacterial biofilm is available today in the form of clear patches that can be surgically implanted on top of the electrodes. "It's not going to replace the electrode, but if you can take that electrode and make it last longer, have more of them, and more of them working at the same time, it means you can do more," says Samuels. Safety concerns make it too risky to implant electrodes too frequently. To create the biofilm, the researchers start with the electrode patch and dip it in their liquid culture of bacteria, placing it under an ultrasound array so that the bacteria can be guided along the tip of the electrode. This is the first step in creating the biofilm. Next, they flash the biofilm with a combination of light and ultrasound to let it mature into a dense biofilm, which can serve to protect the implant. At this point, the biofilm is free floating. It can be safely placed over the electrode and then fixed in place by either dipping it into a liquid polymer or placing a patch of another material over it. As the biofilm is not implanted in the brain, there are no concerns about immune system rejection or concerns about brain infection. The researchers have tested
