Bromocriptine attenuates cognitive decline in frontotemporal dementia: results of a randomized, controlled, pilot study. Cerebrospinal fluid 5-hydroxytryptamine (serotonin) (5-HT), the precursor of serotonin, decreases with age in healthy subjects and patients with dementia. These observations may indicate that age-related decreases in 5-HT are involved in the neurodegenerative cascade, and possibly also in frontal lobe dementia. Bromocriptine (BRO) is a 5-HT agonist that stimulates the release of the neurotransmitter and may, therefore, attenuate age-related decreases in 5-HT. In a double-blinded, randomized, controlled, exploratory pilot study, 30 patients with frontotemporal dementia and 30 matched healthy controls were treated with BRO (7.5 mg/day) for 16 weeks. The cognitive performance of patients and healthy controls was assessed at baseline and after 8 and 16 weeks. In patients, the mean time to complete the Trail Making Test Part B, a test of visuomotor and executive function, improved more in patients than in healthy controls. In contrast, there was a trend toward longer times to complete the visual spatial judgment subtest of the Cambridge Neuropsychological Test Automated Battery in healthy controls. The changes in the patients were correlated with the BRO-induced increase in plasma 5-HT. BRO treatment of frontotemporal dementia patients can reverse the trend toward cognitive decline and may facilitate cognitive performance. These results warrant further confirmation, but, if validated, BRO treatment may offer a potential treatment for dementia.Q: Idiom for the inability to fulfill someone else's expectations In Chinese, there's an idiom that roughly translates to "whatever you do, what you think is not what the other person thinks".
