In some cases, an interconnect may be used to connect two or more pieces of electronic equipment, such as two or more packaged microelectronic devices within a single electronic package. The interconnect may electrically connect the packages to one another, to circuitry of the environment in which they are deployed, to other interconnects, etc. In some cases, the interconnect may be used to transmit data signals between the packages, and in some cases, may also serve to transmit other types of signals (e.g., power, clock, etc.). The interconnect may be communicatively coupled to and electrically connected with the packages and other electronic components through one or more of a variety of conventional techniques, such as wirebonding, tape automated bonding ("TAB"), flip chip, etc. In some cases, the interconnect may include some type of signal-passing structure (e.g., traces, capacitors, resistors, etc.) for transmitting signals therethrough. However, this type of interconnect may be susceptible to mechanical damage that may occur during formation, testing, and other processing steps. As such, interconnects that are more robust and/or that are mechanically resistant may be desirable for certain applications. Q: How to hide/disable browser's back button in Meteor + React? I have a very simple React / Meteor application here: It allows you to upload a photo and share it, with or without an "editable" timestamp on it. And then that, for others to view. The user is allowed to either navigate between different views (react components) through routing. The URL part of the hash within the URL itself contains all the
