I'm coding a desktop application (c#) and I've been looking for a way to create a thread safe list. I have found many implementations of thread safe lists but I can't choose one, so, what class or implementation should I use to do my list? A: Using the ConcurrentList from Nito.Async would be a good choice. It's very fast and thread safe. Note that a thread-safe list does not necessarily need to be thread-safe. For instance, if you just do a list.Add() on the list, and a thread-safe list uses a lock around that operation (because the list is thread-safe), then that's the same as if you were making the list in the first place using a lock. As the authors say in the documentation: If you synchronize the collection, you should synchronize access to the list that underlies the collection. On the other hand, if you're populating the list and are doing something like list.AddRange(newList), then you're not synchronizing at all, and if the thread-safe list underpins a thread-unsafe list, you'll have a problem.
