The skies are cloudless, but it's raining on the other side. The wind has died down, and you can hear the raindrops hitting the pavement. There are usually any number of people walking in the rain, and the subway announcements go into a combination of French and Spanish. But it's not the first thing that comes to mind. When I saw this storefront on the block of 7th Avenue between Broadway and Bedford Avenue, it didn't dawn on me that it would have this kind of ideal weather. But on this summer day, even with the light rain, it was not the weather that was strange. It was that all around it was empty. There was no one walking in front, no one behind. To be clear, I'm talking about this market, which calls itself "The Towne Market." It's not that it's empty, it's just that there are no people outside. People look at other markets that are deserted and see them as "traps," but this one is different. This is not an abandoned store in a blighted neighborhood. It's not an empty strip mall with crumbling paint and an untended parking lot. It's not a retail store with no customers. It's an empty building, but it doesn't feel like a deserted building. It feels like it is in a different time and place than the rest of the street. I rode my bike up to it as quickly as possible, and I quickly noticed that what makes this market different from the other empty markets on the block is the number of signs inside it. The first thing I saw were five posters. The first one was for "Fodor's NYC" and "Roadside America" c6a93da74d
