the services are a fraction of the cost of buying and installing a tracking device. most will have a 30-day guarantee that the lost device will be found, but the cost of the tracking service can quickly add up if you make more than one recovery. the recovery services will try to find the lost computer, but if the stolen unit is out of the country, they may be of little help. if you have a large number of devices, you might save money by using a service that offers a package of different services that you can add as needed. for example, absolute software offers products that come with hardware recovery, as well as software recovery. ipfetcher has currently been tested on windows. the source code is available for download at the site. this tool is not as sophisticated as some of the other programs available.6] adeonaadeona is an open source system for tracking the location of your lost or stolen laptop and is free to use. this anti-theft laptop recovery tool does not rely on a single third-party. it continually monitors the current location of the stolen laptop, gathering information (such as ip addresses and local network topology) and uses it to identify the devices current location. the client then uses strong cryptographic mechanisms to not only encrypt the location data but also ensure that the cipher-texts stored within opendht are anonymous and unlinkable. no person apart from an owner (or a person of the owners choosing) can use adeona to track a laptop. this tool too does not seem to have been updated for some time now.7] adeonaadeona is an open source system for tracking the location of your lost or stolen laptop and is free to use.
