there's no doubt that the most interesting characters in the movie are the ones who are not supposed to be the leads. lauren graham as the sister of the bride is the only one who delivers anything close to a character arc. she's given the most interesting stuff to do, and it's this talk about the group dynamic that is the most intriguing aspect of this movie. in the end, it is clear that the wedding is a farce, and the only way the characters can make themselves happy and get what they want is by keeping things the same as they were before. the romantics is a movie about the worst tendencies of the contemporary young adult, and it's one of the most important movies of the last few years. there is a big difference between a good movie and a good book. while the latter has a plot, a satisfying ending, and a clear denouement, the former is more complex, with many characters, a larger setting, and a more ambiguous moral. the romantics is a book that has been made into a movie, but without getting rid of the source material, and turning it into a clean, conventional product, or creating any kind of enigma. it's important to note that the cast, including both holmes and paquin, are much more than the roles they play onscreen. it is this undeniable quality that is reflected in the romantics. but we're asked to just take these characters at face value. the romantics received praise at the sundance film festival and was nominated for a number of awards, including the grand jury prize. it's also available on netflix instant watch and can be rented in both standard and high definition formats.

the romantics is a shame it's a movie i didn't see when it was released. it's worth seeing now, if you can find a copy. it's worth seeing because in all its restraint and restraintlessness, it's a film that asks a lot of its audience, and that asks you to spend time with it. it's a film that speaks to you and leaves you with a lot of questions -- not unlike one of its characters, who seems to be quite literally walking around with a gun to her head. these are the drawbacks of a real-life story being turned into a movie, and niederhoffer makes a valiant effort to make the most of them. the script, by galt niederhoffer, jennifer chiba, and murray schisgal, is overstuffed with useless characters and plot points, only some of which are ever fully developed. for the most part, the characters are there to be set up for the inevitable romantic and/or emotional entanglements that will dominate the final act of the story. in the new book, "the romantics" (written with friend and fellow coen brother ethan coen), galt niederhoffer has created a young adult fiction novel that follows the lives of four college friends--a couple, a gay couple and a straight couple--as they attempt to navigate the harsh reality of romantic relationships and the choices that they make along the way. the word is often used to refer to language, violence, sexual imagery or other material that adults don't want small children to see. but other films are adult in a different, arguably truer sense. they tell stories about people and situations that children (and the childishy minded) either cannot understand or aren't interested in. and they tell them in ways that demand engagement from the viewer, rather than slack-jawed spectatorship. these aren't shows. they're situations involving somewhat believable adults involved in emotional and sometimes moral conundrums. and you don't always know whom to root for, or if you should root for anyone. without revealing any major plot twists, suffice to say that the college friends in the romantics have, to quote another character, an incestuous dating history, and that by the end of the weekend they've relapsed into old behavior, and said and done things they'll regret later. 5ec8ef588b
