Knowledge of the spectrum of cognitive impairment in multiple sclerosis (MS) is critical for patient management. Some MS patients have difficulty identifying their impairment due to the fact that they have difficulty interpreting subtle changes in their own mental status. Other patients have a tendency to 'disconnect' that is related to the capacity to consider their status in the context of other people's emotional states. A third group does not readily recognize what is happening to them and may be unaware of their own cognitive impairment. We discuss the role of decision making in recognizing impairment and the need for the clinician to help the patient recognize his or her impairment and to initiate appropriate interventions. Russian Lawmakers Acknowledge the Problem - sharyc - - - - - zaretz A few weeks back, I read an article about how Russia was releasing a "pre-digital" version of the national ID card. This was developed as an emergency tool if you have to go to the ER without any proof of identification, etc. They had a video and were explaining the process to Americans who were interested. It seems like an interesting solution to the problem. Development of an animal model for the study of the phenotypic expression of autoimmune disease in the laboratory mouse: systematic analysis of spontaneous autoimmune disease in DBA/1 mice. The laboratory mouse is the only species in which systematic experimental investigation of spontaneous autoimmune disease can be performed. The most commonly used inbred strains of the laboratory mouse have had remarkable changes in their MHC-linked genes in the last 10-15 years, including the deletion of several MHC-linked genes (e.g., RT1.B, RT1.D, RT1.E, and RT1.J) in the last 5 years. Thus, the phenotypes of mice from these strains may not be representative of the phenotypes of mice maintained in the last several years. This study presents a systematic analysis of spontaneous autoimmune disease in a new inbred strain of mice, termed "DBA/1", and demonstrates that this strain is a highly susceptible model for the experimental analysis of autoimmune disease in the laboratory mouse.
