Excellent review. One of the first reviews of 5.2 I've seen, and one of the most detailed. I'm looking forward to testing this the next time I switch to Mac. I'd like to see the same exhaustive level of testing, with a few demands thrown in. I'm sure you picked 5.2 up from the internet. Just how bad or good was it? I tried it a bit last night, and it's a little messy. Many things are configurable, but it's a big app with lots of options. It's not as bad as CS6, but it's still not always the easiest use of your time, especially when compared to photo gallery apps that are much more professional. I love that the 5.2 beta came with a new subscription model. It makes sense, and it's much better for you and me. I've dealt with Pixlr before, it's not a bad app, but it's not on par with ACDSsee or any of the other desktop photo programs. Once you get into areas like brightness and curves, you start to see the limits of it, and it costs a buck per month in the app store. Love the review. I was hesitant about buying the CC subscription, but saw the Mac version was more than enough, and your experience with the application is similar to mine (the versions with unlimited processing.) Your points are well made, and I trust you to know your stuff. I'll be signing up the first of February. The feature that I'm missing is the ability to rename the date a photo was taken with a specific interest for a specific event. Obviously I could do so now, but it would take away from the editing options. It would be nice to have it to, but could cause confusion before I used it. I'm grateful for the feature to sync without Dropbox, I'm just missing it on a day-to-day basis in the name of efficiency.

Use this simple tool to quickly view and delete individual Adjustment Layers. Also, Photoshop now has a new way to access document layers. When you open a Photoshop file in Photoshop, it looks at all the layers in the file and automatically creates groups for those layers that it does not yet know about. You can choose this and add new layers. As far as we know, Photoshop's Groups are currently not available to the web, which means you need to make adjustments to a web document with the new layer visibility method. But once Grouping is available to CSS web pages we will let you know. Photoshop CS5 also now has a new CC tool: the Content-Aware Machete, now free with Photoshop CS5 Extended, that detects areas in the image that were cropped away in the original version.
