The control of peptic ulcer is a growing problem in the western world, and the incidence of the disease is increasing in the Third World. We studied the epidemiological situation of gastric ulcer in a randomized sample of patients attending the University Hospital of Salamanca, and identified the clinical features of peptic ulcer disease in a tertiary care setting in Spain. We report the epidemiological, clinical, and endoscopic characteristics of a sample of 170 patients with duodenal ulcer and 199 patients with gastric ulcer from two hospitals in Salamanca, Spain. The frequency of duodenal ulcer (57.6%) was significantly higher than that of gastric ulcer (42.4%) ($p < 0.001$). Patients with duodenal ulcer were older and more often smokers than those with gastric ulcer. No significant difference was found between the two groups with regard to their
