Reelin is required for the maintenance of normal mouse brain architecture. Reelin is a large extracellular glycoprotein, found in the intermediate zone of the developing and adult mouse brain, that localizes near the substratum. Although its function in normal mouse brain development is unknown, it is required for embryonic lamination and can be used to generate nonmammalian lamination defects in several species. To study the functions of reelin in adult brain structure, the number and distribution of reelin-immunoreactive cells was determined and reelin-expressing elements in the dentate gyrus were quantified following local lesions of the entorhinal and perforant pathway. Reelin-immunoreactive elements were significantly increased near the lesion site, and quantified as either reelin-positive pyknotic cells or immunopositive staining of glial or neuronal processes. Since the phenotype of reelin-mut
