To report the first case of transplant-associated vascular rejection with capillary thrombosis. Two cadaveric renal transplant patients who developed acute allograft dysfunction showed large cell haemorrhagic glomerulonephritis and sinusoid capillary endothelial cell swelling and fibrin deposition on light and immunofluorescence microscopy. The lesions were indistinguishable from acute rejection. Despite treatment with methylprednisolone and antithymocyte globulin, both patients died of systemic haemorrhagic necrosis. Clinical and pathological findings confirm that the entity is probably limited to renal allografts, and the disease appears to be associated with an increased risk for graft loss. The pathogenesis of the angiopathy remains obscure. Opinions of the United 2003 Decisions

We will use immunocytochemical techniques to determine the distribution of polypeptide hormones in placental and uterine tissues, and the circulating concentration of hormones using radioimmunoassays. We will use immunocytochemical techniques to determine the placental and uterine distribution of polypeptide hormones. We will also use radioimmunoassays to determine the circulating concentrations of polypeptide hormones in first and second trimester sheep during normal gestation. Next we will use immunocytochemical techniques to determine the distribution of the hormones in placentas and fetuses of animals in which specific hormone deficiencies have been induced by surgical removal of tissue and by the administration of hormones. In addition, we will determine how various hormones might regulate the growth of the placenta and fetus by assessing the effects of specific hormone deficiencies on weights of placenta and fetus. We will also seek evidence that the growth of the placenta and fetus is differentially regulated by the pituitary. From the studies that we conduct we hope to gain insight into the role of various hormones in controlling growth of the sheep placenta and fetus.It's not clear whether or not the two NHL teams will actually play or not this Saturday. There will be a lot of NHL teams with homes games this weekend, but it's possible that none of them will actually get a chance to play the teams they were scheduled to face.
