When I was building the photo editor, I listened to the needs and feedback from the market. One thing I noticed that nobody saw at the start was dedicated features for photographers — that's not to say features like Lightroom focus mainly on shots from the iPhone, but they can be convenient. One such significant feature for photography is Selective Focus, which allows your focus to be confined to specific areas of your photo. You can use the keyboard shortcuts D to focus on a subject or C for a region, or directional keys like W AD to move your focus. You can also use the radial menu to choose. This lets you focus on areas like people's eyes, their mouth, or the front of their shirt. It could be very useful if you're doing portrait work, for example, where you want a fixed focus on someone's face, but blurred detail in the background. There are also Focus Stacking options if you want to even out shooting conditions between a foreground and background. You can use floating preview or full-screen mode to preview the change you've made to the layer. The results are recorded in the history panel, which can export to a folder or show a thumbnail in the Photoshop Layers panel. After Adobe announced the move to the Creative Cloud in September, it made sense for the company to incorporate a simple email solution on teams. I've used G Suite Mail for many years and thought it was a great tool back then; and it's still great now. Back to the photo editor, content sharing is supported by a couple of options that weren't immediately obvious. The File > Share menu shows a "Send to" submenu, where you can choose how to share your photos based on your own criteria. This sets up a unique URL for your files, which can be sent through e-mail, social media, and many services. You can, for example, pick comments, add titles, set the image resolution and quality, apply transformations, and add and remove tags. The menu also shows thumbnails of the photos you've shared.

The Brush tool allows the user to apply selected brush strokes of most sizes to objects in the photo. It can also be used to apply a new pattern if you want to change the look of the photo. Blend mode puts all elements within a selected area into the new color. The Web really freed a lot of creative possibilities. Businesses could create animations, build mobile or channel apps or get online, and a whole new world of products opened up for creative thinkers. But the Web also created some challenges for designers and developers. Users were more geographically mobile, so they had to develop apps in different formats and languages to support mobile, desktop and more. For Photoshop, photoshop.adobe.com aimed at these full desktop applications, but it was very limited in what it could do. We made the decision to introduce PSD file support in the modern pixel-friendly format of WebP, and then we could start building web-based versions of the Photoshop software. But we didn't want to just add the file format; we wanted to make everything else web-appropriate, from the navigation to the zoom. Taking a fresh look at the user interface, the camera and the library, the team made these key changes. The goal was to retain the Photoshop experience for all users, while providing a modern user experience for those building for the web. As the browser struggles to match the efficiency of native applications, web developers are working ways to offload tasks from the browser back to the CPU. To get the largest performance gains, we couldn't rely on one-off requests. The PSD format in its native form is so bloated that implementing it in JavaScript would be an impossibility. To get the best performance, we needed to incorporate the experience into the browser with WebAssembly. e3d0a04c9c

Adobe Photoshop is now built for teams. If you're using a team with people working on a single project, you can combine their separate work into a single, high-quality shared compilation. For example, you can share a complete, locked-down preview image in the course of a collaborative session. Even when those people leave, they can still work on the project. We'll always be running a large number of tests on your website, but we now have the tools we need to deploy your updates on a more frequent basis. Our updated deployment tools have been tested internally and are now being exposed to our client partners. While we continue to update and improve on our deployment processes, we're also building out a small engineering team to stay on top of them.
