Many people keep asking me this question, but in this post I'll try to answer it using actual data and statistical numbers, rather than my own opinion. Short Answer: In most cases, big data is the same thing as data science. Both terms are often used interchangeably. In most cases, big data is the same thing as data science. Both terms are often used interchangeably. Long Answer: In business, Data Science is getting all the insights and data from your Big Data, getting the right informations out of them, and using them to make more informed business decisions. Basically, data science is a big data practice that has grown and developed a lot more since the big data buzz in 2014. Big data is generally a huge set of data that consists of millions of data records, and a typical application of big data looks like this: The red part is the traditional way to retrieve data, with traditional databases and table queries, and the green part is the new way of getting data using machine learning and big data techniques. Let's take a look at the details of how this works: There's a huge amount of data. The data is copied out of the cloud and saved on local hard disk. This is because the data has to be preprocessed first. The data is loaded into machines as training and test data for a machine learning process to run on them. The data is generally preprocessed by the machine learning process. The machine learning process creates some type of model that extracts certain facts and
