I am not a fan of Adobe Fusion, but I do have a few applications that suite a more do-it-all and less fragile workflow. The biggest question for me would be if I could continue to use Lightroom and Image Pane in combination. If I had to choose my work horse application, it would be LR for cataloging and takedowns, and InDesign for workflow management and design. Not everyone likes Photoshop, but I'm not sure how easy it would be to live without it for so many design related tasks. It certainly would let you get your work done. I hope the best for the Fusion idea!
Jim Denney I have used Photoshop for "yes" extremely long and I personally don't have huge need for any other software for my "work". I do belive that Photoshop could be great if they worked on productivity. For example while designing logos, I'm always lost in the ink tabs at the bottom of the window and the grid is, pardon me, in the middle of the window, not impossible to move, but very hard to get to. I don't have to speak for "power user" but I think for most of us it's not in the way it should be. In other software's I can easily navigate through the window either with buttons or simply with the keyboard (oh, how I miss Tab and Space). I'm not talking about a specific software I'm just saying that I'm really missing the efficiency and consistency that Photoshop currently has. That is why I think Corel Corporation has been slowly developing its own software. I simply don't know if it's going to be enough but I really hope that it's worth it. Thanks.

After a heavy check of its current users, and having the best team of Product Managers designed the Adobe Creative Cloud as the most superior platform, Adobe decided to discontinue the offline version of the software on April 23, 2013. The changes that were implemented in the new release allowed users to download the files locally and run on their computers, but they were not able to create new documents. One of the most important reasons of Adobe's decision was the negative feedback of users and the high number of users who abandoned Adobe After Effects in favour of the online version. Moreover, they offered a new subscription model as a premium version, it was termed as Creative Cloud version. For example, Adobe After Effects CC is 100% online and only allow customers to modify the projects they have created in the previous versions of the software. However, Photoshop CC does not have the similar features to Adobe After Effects CC, yet it was designed to make the transition to a unified desktop editing experience. The current software has the latest features available in the Adobe Creative Cloud.
