Coming with the recent days of increased adoption of GPU-based graphics caching and improved rendering power, Photoshop has seen a rise in performance and runtime to provide far better overall user experience. Considering that the transition to EGL brings up a lot of other problems, the core tools in Photoshop stood the test of time better than the embedded 3D rendering technology. With the QA (Quality Assurance) program debut for the new modern API, the Photoshop team has been working on a lot of 3D features, and now with the update to Photoshop CC 2018, the QA team commented: "The feedback from our customers over the past few days has been very positive. After a full year of development and testing with the updated architecture, we are excited to deliver this major update to you today. We continue to work closely with our customers to offer the best Photoshop experience, and today's release addresses many of the recurring issues and adds a number of new features to help ease image editing considerations," With the introduction of a new native 3D experience, the Photoshop team knows it is a butterfly that can't be trembled. Via the hybrid GPU texture-rendering library, they are looking to solve the many issues that have been witnessed with the embedded graphics API. Till then, keep watching this space for a deep dive on the boost in performance. Perhaps the biggest test of the new API and 3D graphics is the Ta-da filter. Based on a neural network, the machine-learning aspect of this filter enables it to make changes in your image according to your request. Taught via a live example, it makes magic happen, with the AI machine-learning module going to work and bringing the image to life. It is definitely going to be one of the foremost tools for the coming months.
